

Course description

Educational Institution : Al-Nahrain University / Faculty of Political Science

Section : Political Science / Department of International Politics

Stage: Masters

Course Name : Theories of International Relations

Course hours: three hours

Course Course: Quarterly

Professor of the subject: Teacher Dr. Majid Hamid

Objectives of the course: The course aims to introduce the graduate student to the concept of theories of international relations and scientific knowledge of all classical and contemporary scientific theories and how to contribute to following up on the latest scientific developments and theories submitted to explain the phenomenon under study and research, which is the international relationship and to know the extent to which this contributes to the decision-making process in The course also aims to give the student a wide range of hypotheses that have been tested or are still in part of the experience and testing in the field of political science and to show how there are verbal and research metaphors from other sciences to make political science subject to all scientific methodological works by following up new phenomena in international relations and subjecting them to research and interpretation within advanced methodological and research frameworks and methods, as well as providing many .methods that serve the context of the course

Learning outcomes and teaching, learning and evaluation methods

Knowledge and understanding and aim to: - Contribute to -1 introducing the student to the vocabulary of theories of .international relations

Follow up classical and contemporary theories and try to know - how to address and interpret the occurrence of the phenomena of

.international relations

Studying international relations as a purely scientific and - academic discipline by reviewing all scientific theories to study it as an academic science and specialization to achieve through this understanding of international relations as a scientific discipline
.and understanding them as a reality in which we live

Skills related to the subject: - Developing and developing the .2
.student's cognitive and cognitive abilities

Developing the student's research abilities and developing his -
.ability to analyze politically

Providing the student with scientific skills to follow up the occurrence of - political phenomena in international relations and try to apply scientific theories to interpret them or even verify the credibility of some of these
.theories or modify some of their hypotheses

Teaching and learning methods: Trying to make the lecture interactive by -3 developing the participation skills of the student and providing a full explanation from the professor to the student that enhances the principle of
.participation

.Submit research papers -

.Evaluation: Having a written exam of 20 -4

.Participation and attendance of 10 degrees -

Vocabulary of the course .5

The first week

Introduction to the study and definition of the subject

The second week

The concept of theory, its types, pillars and origins

The third week

The importance of theory in international relations

The quarter week

Classical realist theory

The fifth week

Structural realism

The sixth week

Defensive and offensive realism

The seventh week

Liberal theory

The eighth week

Neoliberal theory

The ninth week

Constructivist theory

The tenth week

Feminist theory

The eleventh week

The green theory

The twelfth week

The theory of two commodities

The thirteenth week

Game theory

The fourteenth week

Research discussions and summaries

The fifteenth week

Exam

:Sources and references

Theories of international relations. Specialization and diversity: Tim Dunn .1
and others translated by Dima Al-Khadra

.Theories of international relations, Saad Haqqi Tawfiq -2

.Kazem Hashim Naama, Theories of International Relations -3

.The international system. Theories and problems, Jihad Odeh .4

Balance of power in international relations... Metaphors, Mythology and .5

.Models, Richard Little, translated by Hani Tabry